E. REFLECTION

In our first session on AI fundamentals, I realized how much artificial intelligence is already part of my everyday life. At first, I thought AI was just about robots or for researching assignments, but after learning about concepts like machine learning, deep learning, natural language processing, and computer vision, I understood that it's really about teaching machines to think and act in ways that help humans.

What got my attention to me most was how AI is applied in different fields. For example, in healthcare, it can help doctors with diagnosis. In finance, it can prevent fraud. And in retail, it's the reason why I get product recommendations online. It made me realize that AI is already everywhere, not just in big industries but even in small things like the apps I use every day.

The part about current trends also caught my attention. Tools like ChatGPT and other generative AI systems are proof of how fast technology is growing. I also found it interesting that AI is being used for environmental sustainability. It shows that it's not only about business and profit but also about helping solve global problems.

The ethical challenges made me think deeply. Issues like bias, job loss, and privacy are real concerns. The idea that AI can sometimes act like a "black box" made me wonder how we can truly trust its decisions. It reminded me that while AI is powerful, humans still need to be careful and responsible in how we use it.
